

CRITERIA FOR EVALUATING GS-8 & GS-9 CAREERISTS

Distinguishing between Professional and Technical

To distinguish between the professional and technical employee, a review of the work being done and the individual's ability to assume a greater variety and more complex duties must be considered.

More professional employees have identifiable characteristics when given the opportunity to be creative, to apply analytical methods in solving problems, to act in an advisory capacity and to properly evaluate and report findings. The professional employee has completed the EOD training cycle and/or on-the-job training and has usually been assigned to a specific position and is developing his/her technical knowledge, skills and general job competence. Generally, these employees have completed their formal education. Work assignments should provide opportunity for adding depth and breadth to the employee's experience in their occupational or functional area and be progressively more responsible in nature.

Most technicians are lacking in theoretical preparation and are only able to perform professional duties in a limited field or narrow area. Their training has been limited to on-the-job and the employee requires more supervision when attempting to perform duties outside of established procedures, rules, percepts and guidelines. In the case of the technical employee, assignments with growth opportunities are limited. These employees are well qualified to perform in a limited capacity although no limitation can be determined at this stage of the career.
